While your company’s charitable efforts might feel invisible—and marketing them, inauthentic—a donate-at-checkout option on your website tactfully places your commitment to good citizenship front and center at every sale.

Better yet, it reinforces shared values with your most loyal customers, creating a halo effect of positive perception toward your brand and products.

We’re ChangeUp, helping brands integrate corporate social responsibility (CSR) into the customer experience with easy, impactful donations at checkout. Use this quick guide to launch a donate-at-checkout feature so that your brand—and customers—can do good for the world in a visible and scalable way.

1. Know Your North Star

of consumers say it is important to them that a company supports charitable causes*

65%

of consumers say it is a company's responsibility to give back*

As these expectations continue to rise with younger generations placing greater emphasis on social good, every brand can benefit from a clear social mission.

1. Know Your North Star

Bring your key leaders and stakeholders into a collaborative discussion about your brand's purpose beyond the products.

a) Prepare thought-starter questions:

- What does our brand stand for?
- How do customers perceive our brand?
- How can we make our CSR program more meaningful and impactful?
- Which charitable causes align best with our brand identity?
- What measurable goals can we set for our corporate giving?

Bring your key leaders and stakeholders into a collaborative discussion about your brand's purpose beyond the products.

b) Schedule a meeting now, and invite the following people:

CEO CMO CFO COO Board of Directors

c) Make a goal for the meeting:

Leave with a “North Star,” or guiding principle, to begin identifying potential charity partners.

2. Choose Your Charity Partner(s)

Consumers don't just want brands to give back; they want brands to give back to a cause that strikes a chord. In the previously cited study, 50% of Americans said they would switch to a company that supports a cause they believe in.

Just like your brand speaks to a certain lifestyle and set of values, so should your charitable donations. For example, an outdoor brand might donate to charities focused on conservation or wilderness preservation. Meanwhile, a pet care brand might support animal rights and welfare.

Which charity partners are right for your brand?

Make a list of 3-5 potential charity partners and contact each of them directly. Introduce your company and present the idea of partnering to drive donations. A 30-minute conversation with each organization should be enough to gauge initial interest and begin solidifying your charity partnership(s).

3. Make It Official!

Customers want to know how your brand is making the world a better place and how their hard-earned dollars are, in turn, supporting positive change. In fact, 73% of customers say they consider a brand's charitable work when making a purchase. So, don't be shy about sharing the good you are doing.

Develop a marketing and communications strategy introducing your charity partner(s). It doesn't need to be tedious, but it does need to cover the following:

- Press release and PR outreach
- Website homepage call-out
- New web page or blog post
- Email blast announcement
- Social media announcement
- Ongoing charity partnership updates

Also, be sure to send an internal company announcement encouraging your employees to share the public announcements on their personal social media pages.

4. Invite Your Customers

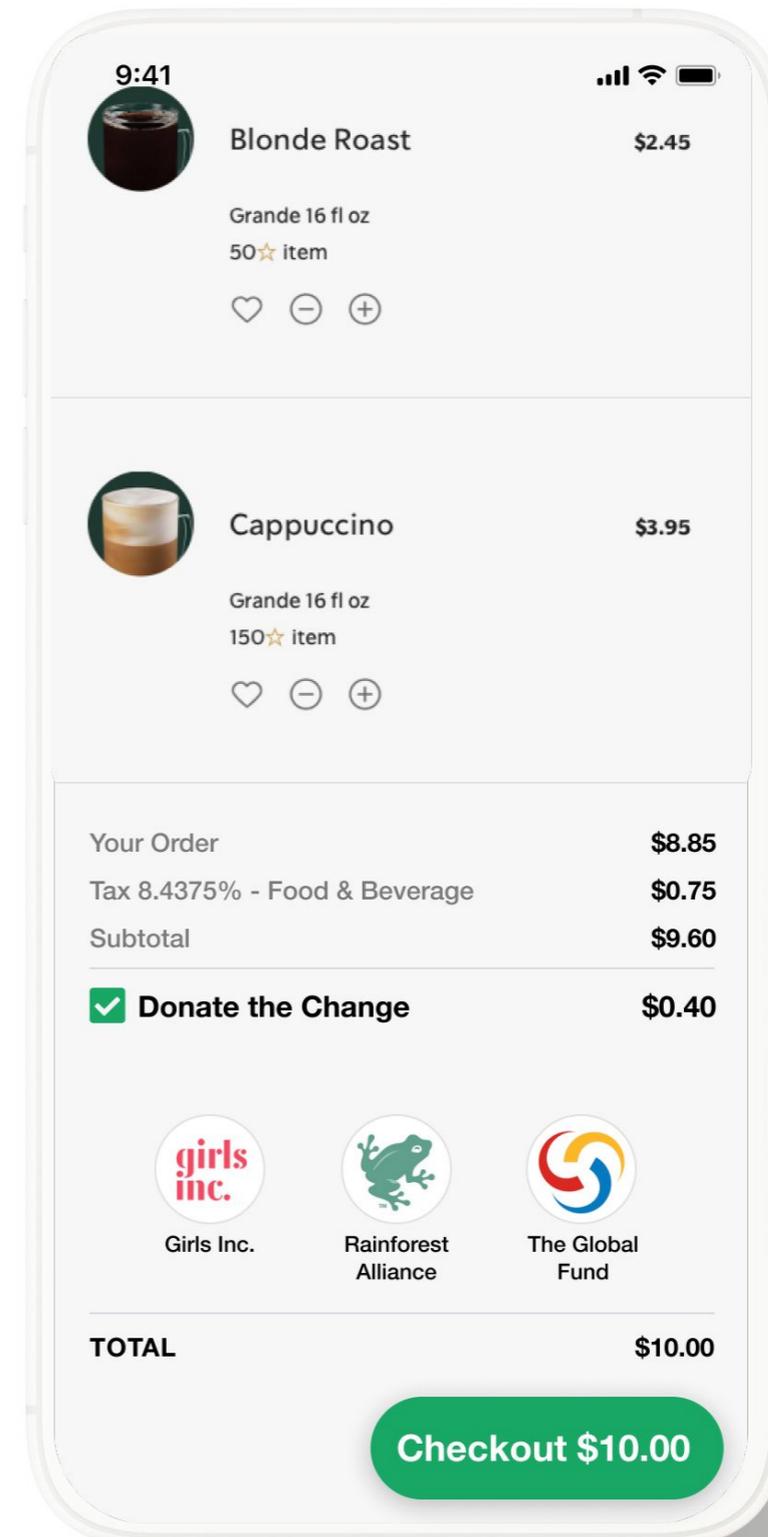

Donation announcements only go so far, especially in the fast-paced age of content consumption, when consumers are quickly scrolling through their news and social feeds. Rather than simply shouting your social good initiative from the rooftops, you can turn it into a unique and actionable opportunity for your customers to become more connected to your brand.

A donation at checkout is direct, unobtrusive, and, as statistics show, effective. In one report, point-of-sale donation campaigns proved to be the most common donation type, with half of respondents donating through this channel.

In a separate survey, 81% of shoppers said they didn't mind donating at checkout.*

4. Invite Your Customers

You can give customers the option to round up their purchase and/or donate a flat amount to the causes you both care about. Research suggests requesting to round up and donate the difference may be met more favorably than asking to donate an additional dollar amount. Either way, consider matching each customer's donation.

5. Find a Reliable Technology Partner

Implementing a donate-at-checkout feature is more challenging than it sounds. User experience, onboarding new 501c3's, donation distribution, compliance and tax receipts are just a few of the many moving parts that can make the process onerous to manage in house.

And remember, the tools also have to look good and function properly for your customers! The project could easily envelop your IT, legal, finance, administrative, and marketing teams all at once.
